Eleonora has a childlike heart in a wonderful mature woman's body, a delicate and sensitive soul of those who have had much less than they feel to deserve from life. Abandoned at a very early age by a father never known, torn by grief for her mother's death, who died after a long illness, she dreams of finding redemption in a man who can love her as she is, without hypocrisy, immune to sterile jealousies and earthly misunderstandings. At the age of thirty-four and working as a professional escort, Eleonora turns into an involuntary and lucid witness to human madness and indifference: in her tastefully furnished alcove, in the sensual red light of a bedside table lamp, depraved, hasty, ambiguous men alternate, prisoners of their shyness and selfishness, unable to give a moment of peace to her tormented and disappointed soul. She has no family, children, trusted friends: she can only offer her wonderfully smooth body, her refined ability to make love in all its empty and exciting shades... When her existence seems to be hopelessly prisoner of the useless daily routine, she knows Manlio, a mature and protective figure who, with his calm and deep voice, manages to mitigate her innermost anxieties and finally make her feel free. He's nineteen years older than her, divorced since long time with a dependent daughter, partner with a prestigious car dealership, Eleonora actually knows very little about him, but she is convinced that his reticence, his fascinating halo of mystery is just a small price on the way to coveted happiness. One evening like many others Manlio arrives very late for an appointment, with his face completely swollen: will it be only an inappropriate chance or are human nature and love going to show her their darkest side? With Eleonora's character Andrea Olivetti finds his dearest themes again, describing extremely in detail and with power an extraordinary woman's innermost life, a prostitute almost for an inscrutable joke of fate. In her we relive the doubts and contradictions of an existence always at the limit, the slow and inexorable succession of the seasons, the enigmatic plans of the Almighty, the infinite thrill of a barefoot walk on a moonlit beach. In her colourful world, studded with crazy, tender and improbable characters, nothing is exactly as it appears, but to find it out we will have to hold our breath until the last, unmissable emotion...
